[redacted] met with Jay Sourwine, of the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee staff, and went over with him the material which the Agency had and which could be made available to the Subcommittee on the subject of the Russian Orthodox Church and its use by the Soviets for intelligence purposes. Sourwine was shown a number of documents, the sources of which could not be identified openly, having to do with persecution of religion in the Soviet Union and related matters. After reviewing this material Sourwine made a determination that it was not suitable for use in a Subcommittee hearing since the sources of these documents could not be identified. Sourwine thanked us for our time and efforts but said he just didn't think they could use the material in that form. It also developed that neither [redacted]
